Keynotes Overview

01 AI Doesn't Implement Itself

Your AI rollout has gone live and adoption is climbing, but the productivity gains in the business case are not showing up. That gap is not a technology problem. It is a leadership and capability problem, and most organisations are not looking in the right place. In this keynote, Lauren Davis makes the case that AI implementation is not a technology rollout. It is a human capability transition, and the organisations getting measurable return are the ones treating it that way. Leaders leave knowing exactly what is standing between their AI investment and its returns, and where to act first.

02 Menopause in the Boardroom

Menopause is one of the most significant transitions a woman will experience. It affects cognition, mood, confidence, sleep, and identity, and it happens, for many women, at the peak of their career. Yet most organisations treat it as a private matter, if they acknowledge it at all. This keynote breaks the silence and explores the psychological and physiological realities of menopause in the workplace, the leadership implications, and what organisations need to do to retain their most experienced women. Direct, clinically grounded, and often unexpectedly funny, this session opens a conversation that is long overdue in most boardrooms.

03 Beneath the Busy

Most of us wear busyness like a badge. It signals importance, indispensability, value. But beneath all that activity, something is being lost: intention, clarity, and the capacity to actually think. This keynote explores the psychology of busyness, why we are so drawn to it, and what it costs us personally and professionally. Lauren draws on clinical experience and real workplace examples to examine what drives our relationship with time, productivity, and worth. To see this keynote in action, click on this link

04 Caring Without Crumbling

HR professionals, managers, and leaders carry a heavy psychological load. They hold other people's distress, navigate conflict, manage performance, and are often the last ones to ask for help themselves. This keynote explores the psychology of caring roles in the workplace: the cost of chronic emotional labour, the warning signs of compassion fatigue, and the difference between boundaries that protect people and walls that shut them out. Lauren offers practical, psychologically grounded tools for sustaining the capacity to care without losing yourself in the process.
